What made you decide to get into coaching volleyball?

Playing for some great coaches as a juniors club player influenced me to get into the coaching world. After two years in college, I wasn't sure what was the path for me and it led back to coaching volleyball. I wanted to be able to give back to volleyball because of what others poured into me. Once I started helping coach club at 20, I was hooked and went into it full-time. If it wasn't for others seeing my potential, I wouldn't be where I am at, helping to influence the next generation of volleyball players.

What are your career goals in the sport?

Current goals include hopefully competing for an NAIA national championship in the next few years, and continuing to develop Indiana Tech into a championship level program on and off the court. In the future, I would love to work with Team USA in some capacity, and eventually would like to end up working at the NCAA Division I Level for a new challenge. Helping the growth of boys and men's volleyball is something else I would like to help be involved with over the course of my career.

Which coaches have influenced you the most?

JW Kieckhefer, Leigh Barea, Mike Isaacs, Jerome Farr and Luke Bentley. These five individuals all took chances on me at different points in my volleyball journey and gave me a space to learn and grow into the coach and person that I am. They are incredible mentors that I am lucky enough to call friends now. If it wasn't for them seeing something in me at some point over the last 13 years, I'm not sure I'd be where I am in the volleyball world.

What do you enjoy most about your coaching job?

Helping to influence the path of 18-23 year olds is one of the most enjoyable things for me. Using volleyball as a vehicle to fuel that relationship and helping others figure out what their calling is post-college. Whatever the end goal is for our student-athletes, it's my belief that it's our job to get them to that point for when college volleyball ends. Being involved in competitive college athletics is a dream job and every day is a reminder of that. The relationships with our student-athletes feel like a second family and reminds me how special athletics is.
